the sunny South and studied vocal technic entirely in New York. Then she went to Europe and prepared in Municat to appear in opera. She had engagements for the season of 1914-15, but the war sent her home to seek an outlet for her voice in a new field.

It is safe to say that she has embarked on a successful career. Singers such as she proved herself to be are exceedingly rare and are to be cherished. In the first place Miss Roberts has a voice of extraordinary richness and power. In the second place she has a technic of the first order. Her tones are perfectly free from the top of her scale to the bottom and she has so perfected the dynamic treatment of them that she sings from a full forte to a planissimo with exquisite gradation and smoothness.

Her breath support is so good that she phrases as she pleases and a well cultivated taste directs her to do it most invated taste directs her to do it most in-telligently. Her diction in Italian, Ger-man, English and Russian was shown man, English and Russian was shown yesterday to be that of a singer who knows no difficulties in pronunciation. Without entering into further details it can be said that Miss Roberts has one of the few great voices that have come before the public in recent years, and that she uses it with the finished beauty of the genuine old Italian school.

If this were all it would be sufficient

If this were all it would be sufficient If this were all it would be sufficient to make her a very important addition to the list of present day artists. But her summertime is not yet come. She is still quite young and the qualities of temperament and musicianship which she revealed in her recital will probably mature. At present she has eloquence in tragic pathos and dainty humor in songs of arch mood. All her interpretations showed good training in style and also a personal feeling for the emotional content of the lyrics.

plosive and her English songs were cold.
But. with Schubert's "Am Grabe Ansolmo's," which opened the second group, she began to show her true value. Naturally some of her songs went with little effect, but only the famous recital artists can sing "Die Mainacht" of Brahms as she sang it and none can surpass her delivery of the familiar three gypsy songs of the same composer.

There was a splendid breadth of style in her "Lied des Harfenmachens" of Haile and in Strauss's "in der Campagna." She sang three playful Russian folk songs in the original tongue most charmingly and then with great emption Rachmaninov's "Kak mnie Bolno." Her command of the declamatory style was well displayed in Schaeffer's "The Eagle."

In short, a new American singer of when much ought to be said in the straus of the Haendel aris and in a gigue by Bach-Schumann. further enhanced. In such numbers as his own arrangement of the Haendel aris and in a gigue by Bach-Schumann his playing showed classic finish, and in Paganini's concerto it contained brilliance in passage work and desirable inclaiveness of rhythm. As a performer Mr. White can still gain something in smoothness of tone, grace and elegance of style and breadth of interpretation, although his pronounced musical gifts have already carried him far.
